FOR AAs, A SEASON OF GRATITUDE

The holiday season can be difficult for many A.A.s, especially the newcomer. The pressure to drink may feel overwhelming when it seems all the world is hoisting glasses in one toast after another. At these times, the prospect of the usual round of holiday parties can be as inviting as a stroll in a minefield to the alcoholic struggling to stay away from the first drink.

The A.A. group, though, can be a refuge. Meeting marathons provide a safe place for recovering alcoholics who are on their own, as well as those looking for a break from family festivities. Some groups schedule dances or potluck dinners, providing a place to congregate and celebrate in sober fellowship.

It's safe to say that A.A. group celebrations are held in most parts of the world, wherever seasonal festivities are celebrated. Large or small, in remote rural areas or big cities, the sharing and hospitality always center on a regular A.A. meeting. But the styles of group gatherings are as varied as the members and regional customs dictate. Some A.A. members will create a tradition of going to dinner with friends on the holidays. A.A.s generally do better with structure, and we can make it easier on ourselves by planning ahead. Arranging our own get-togethers with A.A. members is a good way to make the best of the holidays. Obviously, we can have a New Year's Eve party like anyone else, minus the alcohol (and the hangover).

Some find it rewarding to throw themselves into carrying the message of A.A. by visiting hospitals, treatment centers or correctional facilities. One A.A. returned each year in December to the rehab where he got sober. Another A.A. bakes "cop cookies" and hands them out to officers who used to arrest her.

The story of the first holiday season for A.A. was the subject of an article in the December 1952 Grapevine. Bill W. remembered only a quiet day in New York that first Christmas — there were so few members. Meanwhile, the six men who constituted the whole of A.A. in Akron gathered with their families at Dr. Bob's house. The Grapevine article quotes one A.A. member at that gathering: "There were thanks that we had come this far. However, I am certain that there was still considerable fear and trembling . . . not fear that this new way would not work, but doubt that we would be able to hold onto it. We remembered our many failures and thanked God for what he had already granted us and prayed for continued strength.”

This time of the year can be fraught with yearning for a feeling about the holidays remembered from long ago. It is also natural that if you imagine yourself out of step with what’s called a season of joy, you will feel isolated. And it’s widely accepted that the pressure to be merry, on cue, is stressful. A.A. members, though, have the benefit of a program that teaches the value of acceptance, an antidote to the enforced gaiety of a season when loneliness may seem a failing as well as a misery.

And A.A. members have a way or remaking their worlds, or rediscovering what they once had. In the words of the Twelfth Step, the program of Alcoholics Anonymous is about “the joy of good living.”

As Doug H. in Maine looks back on his drinking days, he remembers the holidays as “something to dread — too much free time to reflect on how lonely I was, what a failure I was. And how was I going to make sure I had enough booze around to keep the demons at bay? Then there were all the people I “had” to see, get-togethers that would remind me, lest I forget, what a failure I was. Now holidays are just what they’re supposed to be, a break from work, a time to relax. Above all, they are a time to reflect on what the A.A. program has given me and to do what I can do in return.”

One member says, “I’m Jewish, but we celebrated all the holidays — had a Christmas tree, the whole thing. Of course, my now ex-wife did everything and I drank.” Now sober 16 years, he reports that, “My first wife has invited me and my current wife to celebrate Thanksgiving at her house. It comes around full circle. The journey continues.”

And, when all else fails, contact your local intergroup/central office for holiday meetings and events in your area.
